

Avoid being scammed on social media.

Who needs a class reunion when you can just catch up with old friends on Instagram, Twitter, or Facebook? Social networking is a great way to connect with friends and colleagues, but it's also a way criminals acquire information to lure people into hoaxes.

The first rule in guarding against scammers is to never give out your personal or financial information - this especially means not sharing any online banking usernames, passwords, or other access details.

Scammers are getting creative about how they obtain access to financial accounts. They often will pose as your friend or your financial institution on social media, in hopes they can trick you into giving them your information. Never share your username and password with anyone, especially on social media.

SCCU will never ask for your account information via social media - ever. Any message you receive from us on social media will come from one of our official accounts and will only be in response to a comment you posted.
